His Iron Nerve

(Original.)

The reign of terror in France was at its height. M. Oudinot sat upon the bench "dispensing justice," which meant ridding the country of the hated aristocrats. He was a man possessing great physical and will power, with nerves of iron. This morning, having heard that one of the most hated royalists had escaped to England, there was an especially merciless expression on his face as his cold gray eyes glanced over the dozen persons cowering before him. One by one he sealed them to the guillotine, till the last, a girl, a mere child, stood up before him, looking at him with a pair of innocent blue eyes, apparently unconscious of her peril.

"Your name?" asked Oudinot, relaxing momentarily from his severe expression.

"Clochette de l'orcinet."

"Daughter of the citizen who styles himself the Marquis de l'orcinet?"

"Yes, M. le Juge."

Oudinot sat irresolute. The marquis was the royalist whose escape had so disappointed the revolutionists. On hearing the hated name the judge spoke the words that condemned the child to the guillotine.

Oudinot leaned back in his chair to rest after his morning's work of condemning a dozen fellow beings to death, and the wretched crowd was led back to the prison. A man enveloped in a cloak and a hat drawn down over his eyes entered the room, throwing off both hat and cloak when he perceived that he was alone with the judge.

"Ha, Sanglier, what do you here," asked Oudinot, "when you should be in the Place de la Concorde working your guillotine?"

"I have engaged a substitute. I wish to resign my position."

"Are you not well paid?"

"Yes, M. Oudinot, I am well paid, but my nerve is giving out."

"Nonsense, man! We have no occasion for nerves when we are ridding France of those who have tyrannized over us for centuries."

"Nevertheless I can bear the strain no longer."

"Are your sympathies turning toward our enemies?" the judge asked, with knitting brows.

"No, M. le Juge. If you, with your inflexible will, were to see what I see every day I am sure you would bend before the sight."

"I bend before seeing these people, who have so long denied us and our children bread, exaltate their crimes? Are you mad, Sanglier?"

Sanglier bent his head in thought.

"I will make you a proposition, M. Oudinot. I will retain my office during tomorrow. Come at the hour the work begins and remain till it is over. If you do not flinch I will acknowledge you are right. If you do you are to relieve me of my office."

"Done," said Oudinot. "I will be there."

In the morning Oudinot after a comfortable breakfast took his hat and cane and strolled toward the Place de la Concorde. As he was about to turn into the space where the guillotine was set up a tumbler passed him with a load of victims, one of them a striping girl leaning over the side of the cart, in whom he recognized Clochette de l'orcinet. She was looking at him with an unconcerned expression, and as the tumbler passed very near him she said softly:

"Good morning, M. le Juge!"

Oudinot started. He had become used to seeing people hear him condemn them to death with fear and trembling, with shrieks and fainting. It seemed to madden him, to put an edge on his cruelty, but this child—what did she mean by wishing him a good morning without the slightest bitterness? He put his hand in his pocket and took out his handkerchief to wipe his brow, for the day was hot, and noticed a slight tremor in his arm.

"Nonsense!" he muttered, and, bracing himself, he hurried on to the foot of the guillotine. Sanglier was standing by the instrument waiting for him. As soon as he saw the judge he called for the first victim.

He was a young noble, who met death unflinchingly. Then came a woman, who had to be carried and placed in position on the guillotine; next a priest, encouraging the others and wearing a look on his face as if he already saw heaven. They followed one another, Oudinot keeping his eyes unflinchingly on them from first to last till Clochette de l'orcinet was led up.

It seemed to M. Oudinot as if something within him were giving way. His head swam. He leaned heavily on his cane. Clochette was placed on the guillotine. Did she look upon it as play? Was she proud to meet death—which she did not understand—as if she had been honored with a prize at school? She lay flat on the board and asked:

"Am I in the right position?"

"She was told that she was. Then, turning to Oudinot, she said:

"Goodby, M. le Juge."

Oudinot swayed, put his hand to his head and cried:

"Hold! There is a mistake in this case. I condemned this child, but there are circumstances of which I was not aware. Remove her from the guillotine. Take her away. I must look into her case again."

Clochette was taken off the machine and back to prison. She was not heard from in France again till after the revolution, having joined her father in England. When the marquis returned to France Oudinot was among those who were proscribed by the new regime, but the marquis interposed in his favor and saved him from the punishment he richly deserved.

The Vital Question

Most Names by Which Diseases Are Known Are Merely Technical Terms to Distinguish Slight Differences.

Chronic maladies are due to two conditions: First, to poor blood and disordered circulation; second, to a lack of nervous force and unequal distribution of it. In other words, we may look to the blood and nerves for most of the lingering ills that weaken, plague or wreck human kind. This explains why Dr. Chase's Blood and Nerve Food cures so many diseases that bear distinctive names. It puts the blood and nerves right, and through them the whole system comes right. This concentrated Food is a blood builder, which so improves the vital fluid that it thoroughly nourishes every part of the body. It is also a powerful vitalizer, that gives an abundant store of energy to the nerve centers, which is distributed to every part, according to its needs. Price 50 cents, five boxes, enough to give it a fair trial, $2.00. Weigh yourself before taking it. Book free.
